this book provides a multifaceted portrait of international procurement which is both a highly important and a highly problematic element of the international trading system it is important because governments purchase enormous amounts of goods and services it is problematic because it is uniquely sensitive to the twin forces that shape international trade liberalization and protectionism liberalization strives to open foreign markets protectionism moves in the opposite direction and aims to protect domestic markets from foreign competition the international procurement system has developed a sophisticated set of agreements that open foreign procurement markets while allowing countries to balance the antithetical forces of liberalization and protectionism the book examines the agreements that have shaped the international procurement system over 75 years it focusses on the wto government procurement agreement and considers how it and other agreements have balanced liberalization against the protection of domestic procurement at the center of this story is the united states which has moved from being a strong proponent of expanding international procurement markets to a more protectionist posture in 1981 it was a strong advocate of the first international procurement agreement thirty five years later it pivoted away from liberalization towards protectionism under presidents trump and biden in contrast to the u s approach the european union has engaged in an ambitious program to expand its access to international markets it has outpaced the united states in the negotiation of free trade agreements the us has not negotiated a new free trade agreement since 2012 and it withdrew from a major asia pacific agreement the book reviews the history of the international procurement system and examines the major agreements that shape it it illustrates how these agreements give individual countries considerable leeway in balancing liberalization and protectionism finally it considers the opportunities for expanding the international procurement system and the prospects of bringing china the second largest economy into the system
