the poems in blue heron delineate a passage through grief and change here personal loss is continuous with threats to other species and landscapes in response robinson has uprooted the terrain of language what bestows itself from the almost invisible and its stain if these uprootings are casualties of a poetics seeking to redress imbalance and pollution then they are also opportunities to rethink what can exist in the field of poetic language as roots also quicken bruise their plural pronouns lose tune forsake terrain by moving through and on it and so blue heron links poetic process with organic process presence with the gap we know as hauntedness the page is not only a resonant physical field but also a site of dialogue between human and landscape between lack and manifestation if these poems constitute a poetics of loss they are equally a movement toward a poetics of openness risk and renewed balance in which poetry shifts as a form of weather a form of following falling from the form as it twists
