Added Value Negotiating 2008-12-29 the traditional adversarial approach to negotiating taught in books seminars and business courses all over the world is a reductive approach each side seeks to gain as much as possible by minimizing the value obtained by the other if both parties are tough negotiators they ll succeed at the second objective and fail at the first the result minimum value for both sides the age old rules are known keep your opponent guessing don t give away too much information about yourself or your needs negotiate from a position of strength and force your adversary to negotiate from weakness use tricks and gimmicks to throw them off their game the legacy of tough negotiating is just as often as not dissatisfaction animosity failed deals broken agreements lawsuits and even war had enough of the same old shoving matches and head games now try added value negotiating the breakthrough five step method pioneered by dr karl albrecht and dr steve albrecht avn does not begin with the usual offer and counteroffer procedure so commonly used in negotiating the first stage is an open and candid sharing of interests and objectives by both parties once both parties have expressed their interests the method proceeds to the careful and thorough identification of the possible elements of value that might be involved in meeting the respective interests this is where the added value component comes in the objective is to build as much value as possible into the deal not as little as possible the avn process then uses various methods for deal building which is a cooperative process of constructing several alternative deal packages each with a different emphasis on various configurations of value the concept of multiple options is extremely important because it replaces the push pull psychology of the offer and counter offer procedure with a cooperative search for mutually acceptable value provide a copy of added value negotiating to every executive manager and professional person in your organization

Breakthrough Method For Breaking Up With Someone You Love 2021-09-09 nobody ever gets into any relationship anticipating a break up break ups just happen it is not as if they happen to any specific type of person or there is anything wrong with the persons who break up it is not even a failure but just an unexpected change in what was once a very loving and passionate relationship in the civilized society that we have evolved into we accept such things and move on seeking other relationships instead of just dragging our feet in a dead relationship but then there is tremendous pain to cope with in fact nothing can be as painful mentally as a broken relationship physically nothing may seem wrong but internally the immune system may take a beating therefore it is necessary to understand how to cope with a break up first thing is to accept that you are a human being and be ready to cry men often hesitate and hurt internally when break up is imminent if they d just cry a bit it would give them a lot of relief women of course have no hesitation in crying sharing grief with close family members and friends lightens the pain its better not to lean on shoulders of everybody as there might be a few who have not yet gone through such pain and may not understand how you feel such people might think you are losing your sanity so they are best avoided at times though the break is not yet final sometimes separation for a while helps people think things through and understand where they were going wrong by giving such space to each other it is possible to review things without any clutter that normally comes with hurling accusations and diverts the attention from the main issue once this happens it easier to resume the relationship while it is good to hope for such an outcome during such a phase it is also pragmatic to be open to other possibilities a frequent outcome of being dumped is you not loving yourself enough many people start feeling guilty but remember almost everybody goes through it at sometime or the other so do not get into that self pity and self denouncing mode which only leads to depression and loneliness start thinking what is good about you surround yourself with people who appreciate you for your abilities inside this ebook you will learn how to effectively cope with breaking up with someone you love you will learn how to go from feeling shit to feeling amazing
