a searing critique of our contemporary policy agenda and a call to implement radical change although it is well known that the united states has an inequality problem the social science community has failed to mobilize in response social scientists have instead adopted a strikingly insipid approach to policy reform an ostensibly science based approach that offers incremental narrow gauge and evidence informed interventions this approach assumes that the best that we can do is to contain the problem it is largely taken for granted that we will never solve it in manifesto for a dream michelle jackson asserts that we will never make strides toward equality if we do not start to think radically it is the structure of social institutions that generates and maintains social inequality and it is only by attacking that structure that progress can be made jackson makes a scientific case for large scale institutional reform drawing on examples from other countries to demonstrate that reforms that have been unthinkable in the united states are considered to be quite unproblematic in other contexts she persuasively argues that an emboldened social science has an obligation to develop and test the radical policies that would be necessary for equality to be assured for all
